FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1906.
The most solid comfort one can find back again is the thought that the business of one's life is to help in some small way to reduce the sum of ignorance, degradation and misery on the face of this beautiful earth.—George Eliot.

Death of President Spencer.
The tragic death of President Spencer, president of the Southern Railway Company, by an accident on his own railroad, is perhaps the last disaster and most distressing. But his death from any cause would have produced profound sorrow and grief throughout the South. Mr. Spencer was a Kentucky man, born in Georgia, and educated at the University of Georgia and the University of Virginia, and he devoted the last years of his life to the development of Southern railroads and Southern industries. No man in the South did more to improve our railroads, to make them more efficient, to make the railroad the backbone of industry, than President Spencer.

Mr. Spencer felt that it was not alone the duty of a railroad to haul freight and passengers, but that it was also under obligation to aid in the development of the country through which it passed; and to road, perhaps, has done more faithful and valuable service than the Southern in work of this character.

Only a few days ago the Times-Dispatch stated that during the past year about 25,000,000 new passengers were carried by the Southern Railway and the Mobile and Ohio, which it operates. We also called attention to the fact that much of this development was due to the efforts of President Spencer, who, as the president of the Southern Railway, was the man who had made it possible for the Southern Railway to carry so many passengers.

Mr. Spencer was one of the ablest and fairest railroad men in the country, and not only a man of intelligence, but a man of high character. In his writings and speeches on the subject of rates he showed singular comprehension and grasp of the subject, and was able to see the people's side as well as the railroad's side of the argument. No one could read after him without feeling that his views were not only reasonable, but judicial. In our opinion, no man has contributed more than he to the solution of this entire subject.

In his death, the South loses a devoted and valuable friend, and it will be difficult to find a man to take his place. His sudden and tragic death is a great misfortune, and to thousands who knew and admired him it will be a personal sorrow.

But he labored wisely and successfully for the land he loved as well as, although the summer of his death seems fearfully cruel, it was perhaps his own cherished desire that he should die in the garden, in the midst of his own activities, and while his farm, his industry and his usefulness were at the zenith.

Greater Richmond College.
The gift of $100,000 from the General Education Board to Richmond College, which far more than appears on the surface, it is really the beginning of a movement, the ultimate object of which is to raise from two to three million dollars for the development of this central institution of learning. The men at the North who have interested themselves in Southern education, after casting about and surveying the whole field, concluded that Richmond, with Richmond College as a nucleus, was one of the best and most promising points in all the South for a great school, equipped with every modern facility for the education of young men and young women, and to that end they propose to co-operate heartily with the management and friends of the institution.

It is a man's task to raise so large a sum of money, and it is not expected to raise the entire sum in a short time, but the plan is broad-gauged, and there is reasonable prospect of raising at least a million within a year or so. But whether the plan is to be carried out, the general plan will not be altered, and the men in charge will continue to labor in the interest of its ultimate accomplishment.

In the meantime, with $100,000 from the General Education Board as a starter, there is every promise that at least half a million will be raised in the early future, which will be used, as already outlined, in enlarging the scope of the work at Richmond College, adding to its equipment and erecting new buildings for the Women's College.

This of itself will give Richmond one of the most complete colleges in the South, will add enormously to our prestige as a center of education, and will give blessed advantages to boys and girls in and around Richmond who are not able to seek higher education in other fields. The benefits to Richmond of such an institution will be almost incalculable, and will make her all the more desirable as a place of residence.

The Right of the Accused.
Recently in the town of Center, Texas, a negro was arrested, tried, convicted and executed within the space of two hours. The Washington Post was requested to state whether or not so summary a proceeding as that is warranted by the Federal Constitution. The Post replies that the conditions of Article VI, of the Federal Constitution (meaning the Sixth Amendment) were complied with in the Texas trial. The Norfolk Landmark replies to the Post that, according to a decision of the United States Supreme Court, the Sixth Amendment applies only to the Federal courts and does not limit the power of the State courts. By way of illustration the Landmark says that in a case of criminal assault on trial in a Virginia court several years ago the testimony of the victim was introduced through notes, and the point was raised that this was in violation of a provision of the Sixth Amendment, which declares that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. But, adds our contemporary, the "point was wrong, because the application of the right is to the Federal courts only. The case went about without the personal appearance of the principal witness, the jury rendered a verdict of guilty, and the accused was hanged to the gallows of course."

But the State Constitution applied, for it is specified in our Bill of Rights that "in all criminal prosecutions a man hath a right to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses, to call for evidence in his favor, and to a speedy trial by an impartial jury of his vicinage."

It will be observed that the Virginia Constitution on this point is even more explicit than the Federal Constitution, for the latter provides that the accused "shall enjoy" the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him, while the former provides that he "shall" be confronted with the witnesses. The latter is more definite, and the accused is more definitely guaranteed his right.

A Wobbly Octopus.
The industry in Standard Oil has not been selling their stock, but the little bit on the outside has been an awful scam, and the securities of the grandsons of all the octopuses are being sold in a very like a money market before a cyclone.

The break of 25 points in Standard Oil stock on the exchange was followed by a sharp decline in the price of the stock. The Standard Oil stock is now selling at 25 points below its former price, and it is expected that it will continue to decline.

On May 11 President Roosevelt sent to Congress his special message on Standard Oil and other trusts, announcing that the Department of Justice will take up the question of instituting prosecutions in at least one of the cases. The stock broke instantly nearly 20 points, and it was expected that it would continue to decline.

This second break, within a year, is perhaps the heaviest decline in the stock's price. It broke 25 points in the first half of 1905, and it fell 20 points in the second half of 1905. It is expected that it will continue to decline.

Assets of Cities.
Mr. Robert Taylor, auditor of the city of Baltimore, writes to say that the publication of the financial condition, showing the city's assets at $1,726,000, does not show that city an impostor, but that the city is, in fact, a very rich city. The city's assets are $1,726,000, and the city's liabilities are $1,726,000. The city is, in fact, a very rich city.

THEATRES
Not much can be said in praise of "By Night of Givens," which was presented at the Academy last night by Mr. Robert Wynn and a company of only average ability. The play is a dramatization of Mr. Macmillan's interesting novel of the same name, and follows it very closely in plot and action, and there are some very striking situations, which, in the hands of better players, would be quite effective.

SIXTY MEN IN BRIG FOR MUTINY ON TENNESSEE
[Special to The Times-Dispatch.]
NEWPORT NEWS, VA., November 29.—Although the captain denies the report that there was a mutiny among the sailors on the cruiser Tennessee, the trip up from Panama, and the officers refused to talk, sailors ashore from other vessels feel that the story is true, and that there are about sixty men in the "brig" on the Tennessee. It is now said that the sailors on the Tennessee are satisfied and on the verge of mutiny before the ship sailed South, on account of the food given them.
